<sup>1</sup> A commodity appears at first sight an extremely obvious, trivial thing. But its analysis brings out that it is a very strange thing. It brings forth living offspring, or, at the least, lays golden eggs.

<sup>3</sup> In northeastern American woodlands a brood of periodical cicada nymphs hatch drop and burrow into the ground where for seventeen years they feed on sap from tree roots, passing through five molts. Then all at once in late spring they tunnel to the surface, largest migration on the planet, up into tree branches, where they take their sixth. Soon the woods' inhabitants are gorging themselves on these adults as they mate lay eggs and die. Their carcasses piled and decomposing, their eggs hatching and the cycle beginning again. "Predator satiation." There's a brood passing somewhere every year with trees recording inordinate growth.
